between Great Britain and Germany. Hess was locked up for the duration of hostilities, and now is in jail at Spandau.

After lunch, I stopped at the publishers, Batsfords, in Fitzhardinge Street. These are new quarters for them. They have an extensive stock of architectural and other books, of which I gathered in quite a few.

This afternoon, I attended a meeting of members of the National Estimates group from CIA Headquarters in Washington. They have been reviewing their estimates with representatives of various departments of the British Government. Their conclusions were interesting and informative.

The Mexican Ambassador, a jolly fellow, paid a return call. Afterwards, I saw Lt. General R. W. Porter, Jr. Bob Porter was, during the war, the most effective G-2 officer I met. He was ~~very~~ sympathetic to OSS work, and understood the use of agents in a way that few, if any, regular Army officers did. He is now our leading military representative in Turkey, a Lt. General at the age of 52, and is probably the youngest in his class, and would, I should think, have a brilliant future before him.

We had dinner at home tonight for the Dimitris, and Kay and Rudolph De Trafford. Rudolph has been unusually successful in business. He picked up the Philip Hill bank, and later consolidated it with others, including Leo d'Erlanger's investment banking business. He is a director of many companies here, including large insurance institutions. Dimitri is the agent for Old Forester bourbon whiskey, and Sheila runs a travel agency. Rudolph has bought a third of a castle in Italy, about seven miles from Rome. The rest of it is owned by Andy di Robilant. He and Kay are now engaged in putting it in order. He expects soon to retire as chairman of his business.
